and then they took all of use down these stairs and into a damp room and it was a far bigger room than i thought could have been underneath the house. they lined us up in a circle and they were all laughing and i sort of thought it was funny too because what the hell were we doing there? then it went quiet for a moment and the guy with brown hair gestured towards me and made me take off my top which was fine because i dont mind what i look like and i am in relatively good shape,

It's sort of post-post internet. it's a thing that says okay we know what happens when people live around the internet. what happens when the internet lives around people? They are totally artificial scenarios, usually an interaction between a figure and some sort of intrusion, be it a logo of a company, or a drawing of a penis; the figures are in some way distorted, abused or accused by what is happening on the surface of the painting. They are labelled and identified by their vices, if such 'entities' can even engage in such behaviour. The total lack of any grounding in the real world, or narrative structure, is crucial to allow these figures to embody a totalising void, sucking in iconography which purports to offer some sort of clue to their predicament, but ultimately draws a blank, engaging in the airtight logic created by the group staring vacantly at the viewer.

They are nothing and yet signal towards a perverse humiliation ritual that simply must have taken place – did this ritual take place in the virtual or the real world? Can these figures feel pain? The surface of the painting is a skin, riddled with imperfections, describing a condition of total absence, akin to the hollow emotions that tail complex trauma. Numbness in pictorial form, with a promise of malice and masculine posturing. The pictures act as permanent reminders of some form of group-related trauma, with the figures on display seemingly neither willing nor unwilling, but resolvedly indifferent, perhaps scarred by what may have taken place.

The difference in resolution and content across images perhaps hints at a hierarchy of memories, with some events (the most pixelated) being suppressed, unable to be fully rendered/recalled. The haunting, disfigured visage in panel 3/4 distils this nebulous unease into a garish display of bodily alteration, perhaps from the ritualistic abuse, or perhaps there previously, making the figure a target for humiliation.

It simply doesn't matter if this humiliation ritual took place online or in the real world. The figures are harmed somehow, and bear the marks of what may have harmed them (or what may have helped them).

The use of artificial image generation is of crucial importance – the figures are totally synthetic, generated through an estimative process which describes everything surrounding them, much as blank spots in memory are filled in through knowledge of surrounding events. They are a mixture of virtual content available online, and generative content created on crude web-based software.

george,
david p.
and sex-

and so there is george, rob p. and sex-man and george says to rob p. do you know what we are supposed to be doing here and the sex-man makes some weird comment because he is thinking about sleeping with one of the attractive ladies who is at the bar because that is what he came here to do after all, and george and rob p. wonder what it is actually like, like what happens after the sex is done do they talk about what just happened or do they get to know each other or does one of them just leave or does the lady say o i have someone coming round or there is a plumber at the door or something who she needs to let in so he has to leave or do they go out for breakfast and is that how it starts or do they go out again because they enjoy each other's company and the sex-man would like what just happened to happen again and then rob p. said to sex man do you know where tim smith is? and the sex-man said no hes at home eating pop tarts the stupid man stupid moron man the stupid fool because look at what he's missing out on there are so many people in here to get to know and i bet if i bought you a drink or something you'd say thank you for the drink or whatever. anyway i am going to go over to the bar and talk to people and see if i can get talking to any women or something and george said i don't understand why he is doing that because this isn't the sort of place you meet the person you're gonna want to spend the rest of your life with probably that would happen somewhere were you have shared interests and can talk properly or something before it all kicks off and people start fucking whoever or something it just doesn't seem right to him.
